

10 Common Medicaid Planning Mistakes to Avoid

Posted on March 16, 2026

Planning for long-term care is one of the most important steps Pennsylvania families can take to protect their assets and financial security. With nursing home costs in many parts of the state often exceeding $10,000 to $15,000 per month, a single mistake in Medicaid planning can lead to massive, unnecessary out-of-pocket expenses.

Medicaid, called Medical Assistance (MA) in Pennsylvania, is the primary government program that pays for long-term nursing home care. Qualifying for Medicaid can help families preserve assets for future generations. But the rules are strict, and even small errors can create delays, financial penalties, or complete denials of coverage. Below are the most common Medicaid planning mistakes Pennsylvania families make, and how to avoid them.

Mistake #1: Waiting Too Long to Start Medicaid Planning

Procrastination is one of the costliest mistakes families make. When individuals wait until they are already ill or entering a nursing home, their options become more limited. Late planning can trigger forced “spend-downs” and expose more assets to Medicaid scrutiny within the five-year look-back period.

How to Avoid It:

Start planning while you are still healthy. Early planning preserves more tools, such as trusts, gifting strategies, and asset restructuring, which may no longer be available later.

*Please note that even if your loved one is already in a nursing home, there are still tools available to preserve some assets. Speaking to an experienced elder law attorney can help determine your options for your specific financial situation.

Mistake #2: Making Asset Transfers Without Understanding the 5-Year Lookback Rule

The Department of Human Services (DHS), which is the agency that administers Medicaid in Pennsylvania, examines all financial transactions from the past 60 months (5 years) to identify any transfers made for less than fair market value. Improper transfers (even unintentional gifts) can trigger transfer penalties: a period of ineligibility for Medicaid benefits.

These penalties can be severe. For example, gifting $100,000 within the look-back period can cause a roughly 10-month ineligibility period, during which the applicant must pay for care privately.

How to Avoid It:

Do not transfer or gift assets without the guidance of an elder law attorney who understands the consequences under Pennsylvania's Medicaid rules.

Mistake #3: Attempting DIY Medicaid Planning Without Legal Guidance

Pennsylvania's Medicaid regulations are deeply complex, and even well-intentioned DIY planning can trigger penalties or lead to denial of benefits. Common missteps include poorly documented caregiver agreements, incorrect spend-down strategies, using annuities that are not Medicaid compliant, and improperly structured asset transfers.

How to Avoid It:

Engage a qualified elder law attorney early. Legal guidance helps families avoid errors and often preserves significantly more assets in the long run.

Mistake #4: Misusing or Failing to Use Medicaid Trusts Properly

Trusts are extremely powerful Medicaid planning tools, but only when used correctly. Families often create or fund trusts too late or use the wrong type of trust, resulting in unintended look-back penalties or loss of eligibility.

How to Avoid It:

Ask an experienced elder law attorney whether an irrevocable trust, Medicaid Asset Protection Trust, or caregiver agreement is appropriate for your situation.

Knox Law's Elder Law group has experience with and utilizes a variety of trusts that can achieve our clients' asset protection and elder law goals. One commonly used trust is an irrevocable trust. Because irrevocable trusts cannot be altered after creation, assets placed in them are generally excluded from Medicaid's resource calculations (as long as the trust is drafted correctly and complies with Pennsylvania's Medicaid rules).

We also have experience with Special Needs Trusts, which are a type of trust designed to provide for the needs of an individual with special needs and which can help those individuals stay eligible for public assistance.

Using trusts for long-term care planning, asset transfers, and/or special needs has many advantages beyond protection of your assets, including flexibility, centralized decision-making, and tax benefits. Our team can educate you and your family about your options and the many reasons to use trusts.

Mistake #5: Overlooking Spousal Protections and Community Spouse Rights

In Pennsylvania, the "community spouse" (the healthy spouse still living at home) is permitted to retain significant income and assets. But improper planning or lack of documentation can result in the healthy spouse losing resources they are legally entitled to keep.

How to Avoid It:

Use Pennsylvania's community spouse rules strategically. Proper planning can preserve a substantial portion of marital assets for the spouse who remains at home.

Mistake #6: Poor Documentation of Income and Assets

A common and often overlooked mistake in Medicaid applications is failing to provide complete, accurate, and well-organized documentation of income, assets, and financial transactions. Pennsylvania's Department of Human Services (DHS) requires extensive verification when evaluating Medicaid eligibility, including bank statements, retirement account information, property records, insurance policies, and proof of income. Missing documents, inconsistent statements, or unexplained withdrawals can cause long delays or even a denial of benefits.

Even ordinary financial activity can raise questions if not properly documented. For example, ATM withdrawals, checks written to family members, cash gifts, or routine transfers between accounts may be viewed as potential gifts or improperly transferred assets unless clear explanations and records are provided.

How to Avoid It:

Maintain organized financial records and gather documentation early. Before submitting an application, work with an elder law attorney or paralegal to ensure all income sources, assets, and transactions are fully accounted for and supported by proper paperwork. This reduces the risk of delays, requests for additional information, or penalties related to the five-year look-back period.

Mistake #7: Failing to Use Legal Spend-Down and Asset Protection Strategies

Many Pennsylvania families assume they must exhaust their life savings before qualifying for Medicaid, and do not understand the asset limit rules. This isn't true. Medicaid allows applicants to legally "spend down" assets in ways that benefit their health, home, and spouse - all without jeopardizing eligibility. However, many people go through this process incorrectly or fail to use available strategies altogether, resulting in unnecessary loss of assets or prolonged periods of ineligibility.

Common mistakes include paying off large debts at the wrong time, making disallowed gifts, purchasing non-exempt assets, or failing to convert countable resources into exempt ones. Without proper guidance, families may spend money in ways that trigger look-back penalties or miss opportunities to protect assets for a spouse or heirs.

How to Avoid It:

Work with an elder law attorney to implement a structured, legal spend-down plan. Effective strategies may include making home improvements, purchasing medical equipment, arranging prepaid funerals, converting assets into exempt resources, or using specialized financial and legal tools designed for Medicaid eligibility. When done correctly, spend-downs can accelerate eligibility while preserving a significant portion of assets.

Mistake #8: Ignoring Medicaid Estate Recovery Rules

Many families focus solely on qualifying for Medicaid and overlook what happens after benefits are received. Pennsylvania's Medicaid Estate Recovery Program (MERP) allows the state to seek reimbursement from the estate of a deceased Medicaid recipient for the cost of long-term care services paid on their behalf. This can include recovery against a home, bank accounts, or other probate assets, potentially reducing or eliminating what heirs inherit.

A common mistake is assuming the state will automatically seize the home or that nothing can be done to protect it. In reality, Pennsylvania's estate recovery rules include several exemptions, delays, and planning options. But without proper preparation, families may unknowingly leave a home or other assets vulnerable to a recovery claim.

How to Avoid It:

Discuss estate recovery with an elder law attorney before applying for Medicaid. In many situations, proactive planning can significantly reduce or eliminate the impact of estate recovery while remaining fully compliant with Pennsylvania law. This planning can include placing assets in an irrevocable trust, using allowable transfers, or ensuring the home passes outside of probate.

Mistake #9: Applying for Medicaid at the Wrong Time

Timing matters. Submitting a Medicaid (Medical Assistance) application too early or too late can be costly. Apply too early, and you risk a denial because you're still over the resource limit, or key transactions (like spend-down purchases, annuity funding, or trust deposits) aren't complete, forcing you to refile and lose valuable time. Apply too late, and you may miss months of eligibility, resulting in unnecessary private-pay charges while the application is pending.

In Pennsylvania, timing also intersects with the five-year look-back and the start date of any transfer penalty. A penalty period for gifts or below-market transfers won't begin until the applicant is (1) in a nursing facility level of care, (2) financially eligible (under the resource limit), and (3) has applied and is otherwise eligible. If you apply before you meet all three conditions, the penalty clock won't start. Conversely, waiting to apply after you are already eligible can forfeit months of covered care. For married applicants, the "snapshot" for community spouse resource calculations is tied to when the institutionalized spouse first becomes continuously institutionalized. So, delayed planning or filing can undermine optimal results for the community spouse.

How to Avoid It:

Coordinate the application date with your spend-down, documentation, and care timeline. Make sure countable resources are under the limit, all required verifications are compiled, and any transfers or permissible conversions to exempt assets are complete before filing. Take advantage of retroactive eligibility (if applicable) and work with an elder law attorney to set the filing date to (a) start any unavoidable penalty as soon as possible, (b) protect the community spouse's share based on the correct snapshot, and (c) minimize or eliminate uncovered private-pay periods.

Mistake #10: Not Accounting for State-Specific Medicaid Eligibility Rules

Another significant mistake is assuming Medicaid rules are the same across all states. They are not. Medicaid is a federal-state partnership, which means each state, including Pennsylvania, sets its own eligibility requirements, exemption rules, documentation standards, and asset-protection options. What works in one state may be completely ineffective or even harmful in Pennsylvania.

Common misunderstandings include the treatment of retirement accounts, rules for spousal protections, how the five-year look-back is applied, which assets are exempt, and how estate recovery is enforced. Families who move to Pennsylvania from another state or rely on online articles written for a different jurisdiction often end up misinformed, leading to avoidable spend-downs, penalties, or delays.

How to Avoid It:

Base all planning decisions on Pennsylvania-specific Medicaid regulations. Work with an elder law attorney who practices in Pennsylvania and stays current on DHS rules, waiver program changes, and state-level updates. Tailoring your plan to Pennsylvania's laws ensures you maximize available protections while maintaining full program compliance.
